Violet Fox 🦊
@violetbfox

No questions posted in advance: we'll have an informal discussion of the issues involved in proposing new #LCSH & whether "Foodways" and/or "Soul food cooking" are good LCSH candidates. Please read the chapter at critlib.org/critcat-subjec... & come with questions!

Hello everyone and welcome to tonight's #critlib chat! I couldn't come up with a clever title so I'm calling this one the "#critcat subject heading appraisal". #critcat is short for critical #cataloging, closely related to the storied history of radical cataloging.

Ok! On p. 71: "Soul food cooking" is related to southern cooking and could be classified at TX715.2.S68, but because "Soul food cooking" is just a cross-reference to "African American cooking," soul food cookbooks cannot be classified at that number.

Yes, great point @magsjoy20. Catalogers are nearly always highly dependent on how a book is selling itself, whether that's accurate or not. That can lead to some real problems in the case of people trying to sell a book as something it's not. #critlib

Is that true, though, that it's easy to determine how credible a Wikipedia article is? It is if it's well written and well sourced with current sources that haven't rotted. That's definitely not true for all articles. #critlib

Also the Wikipedia community has its own process for creating and maintaining categories/subjects, so you can end up with similar issues as LCSH

@JMarkOckerbloom

Indeed. I'm not saying there aren't issues w WP's processes (& I don't want to derail this #critlib too much onto WP). But it's an important way to hear from communities outside the usual library ones. (E.g. their terms for indigenous groups often seem notably better than LC's)

A question: as keyword searching only increases in popularity for access do people feel that updating subject terminology will take a backseat? If all resources about foodways include foodways in their title/summary/chapter titles, etc. is it crucial to make it an LCSH? #CritLib

Really interesting question! My first gut reaction was a student's righteous "YES" but then I wonder / don't know - are these headings used anywhere else in an book's life (algorithms for purchasing, etc) that would benefit from the LCSH change (or hurt from no change)? #critlib

As a ref librarian, I don't have as much exposure to current topics in cataloging as I would like. Enjoyed reviewing this #critlib chapter on how #LCSH and #LCC standards often marginalize concepts and hinder access to culturally relevant material.
